

Notes on Contributors

Kwame Akyeampong is a Senior Lecturer in International Education at the Centre for International Education (CIE) Sussex Institute, University of Sussex, UK. He gained his doctorate in Education from the University of Nottingham, UK. Before moving to Sussex, he was the Director of the Institute of Education, University of Cape Coast, Ghana. His special interests are teacher education, educational assessment and education programme evaluation. He has undertaken a number of consultancies examining the effectiveness and efficiency of educational innovations and practices in Ghana. He has written a number of articles on teacher education and education management in developing world context. His email address is:

A.Akyeampong@sussex.ac.uk.

N'Dri T. Assie-Lumumba has published extensively on various aspects of education in Africa in general but especially francophone Africa. Her research has been on equality, political economy, history, educational innovations and the impact of information and communication technology on education, and gender and development. In 2003 she was a visiting professor in the Centre for the Study of International Cooperation in Education (CICE) at Hiroshima University. Her email address is:

na12@cornell.edu.

David Ellerman recently retired from ten years in the World Bank where he was economic advisor to the Chief Economist (Joseph Stiglitz and Nicholas Stern) and is now visiting the University of California at Riverside. His paper draws on his forthcoming book on development assistance, "Helping People Help Themselves." For his writings on other topics, see his website: www.ellerman.org. His email address is:

david@ellerman.org.

Kenneth King is Professor of Comparative and International Education and Director of the Centre of African Studies in the University of Edinburgh. He has published on the history and current status of aid policies and practice in Africa, as well as on skills development and the informal economies of Africa. He has edited for almost 20 years a network bulletin which looks critically at the changing aid discourse especially in the sectors of education and training. His email address is:

Kenneth.King@ed.ac.uk.

Noel McGinn is Professor Emeritus of the Harvard University Graduate School of Education. He serves occasionally as a consultant on projects attempting to strengthen the relationship between research and policy and practice in education systems. He has published on school effectiveness, educational planning and policy analysis, decentralization, and the impacts of globalization on education. His email address is:

nmcginn@igc.org.

Masafumi Nagao is a research professor at the Centre for the Study of International Cooperation in Education, Hiroshima University. He did his graduate work in economics at Hitotsubashi University and worked for UNCTAD and the Sasakawa Peace Foundation before joining CICE in 1998. His main research interests are in programme evaluation, especially in the area of education. His email address is:

nagaom@hiroshima-u.ac.jp.

Nobuhide Sawamura is Associate Professor at CICE, Hiroshima University and previously worked in JICA. His research interests concern education and international cooperation in Sub-Saharan Africa. He is currently working on primary schooling in Kenya and has also been supporting several JICA-assisted education projects in Africa including Ghana, Ethiopia, Kenya, Malawi and South Africa. His email address is:

nsawamur@hiroshima-u.ac.jp.