Today's training was composed of two lectures by two associate professors from graduate school of Hiroshima university.

In the morning, associate professor Jun Takizawa from the faculty of Education, whose specialty is educational administration, explained about educational administration situation in Japan quite fundamentally but broadly. During that lecture, trainees seemed to be interested in the way how Japan have ever tried to equalize the quality of education between rich city areas and poor rural areas. Basically, one of the biggest issues in developing countries' education systems is substantial quality and quantity gap between city and rural area.

During the afternoon lecture, associate professor from IDEC, whose specialty is teacher education, explained about teacher education in Japan especially from the view point of top-down policy. His lecture included not only recent teacher education reform but also historical background of teacher education.

Trainees got along and exchanged opinions more actively each other than last week.
