

School improvement practice in Ugandan secondary schools – Case study

Hiroaki Ozawa

Naruto University of Education

After introduction of Universal Secondary Education Policy in Uganda, secondary schools were struggling to adopt rapidly increase of students' number with scarce resources. This study focuses on school improvement process initiated by schools. Case study of six secondary schools indicates that the head teachers identified various challenges and solved some of them. One of the finding is discrepancy between the issues raised by students and those by teachers.